In detail

From 2002 to 2004 Bjørn was director of Denmark's national Environmental Assessment Institute. He organised "Copenhagen Consensus" in 2004, a project which brought together some of the world's top economists to prioritise the best solutions to the world's biggest challenges. Essentially, he asked these experts to tackle the question: With limited resources, how can we do the most good possible? In 2006 he repeated the "Copenhagen Consensus" project with top United Nations ambassadors instead of economists. He managed to bring together representatives from China, India and the USA, representing about half the world's population.
